FARMS FOR SALE OR FOR LEASE IN RHODE ISLAND.

This, the first bulletin of the Rhode Island State Conservation Commission, presents in detail, a list of farms in Rhode Island which, at the time of enumeration, December 11, 1910,—April 1, 1911, were reported as for sale or for lease. Owing to the difficulties encountered in enumerating farm properties during the winter months, the Commission is unable to publish, at this time, a complete list of farms for sale or for lease in the State; but it presents its first bulletin on this subject, covering such properties as have been collated and collaborated, believing that it is better, for obvious reasons, to publish the information it has on hand at once, than to delay its issue until the work has been entirely completed. A supplementary bulletin describing such farms as have not been listed to April 1, will be forthcoming at an early date.

An attempt has been made to give such information as is deemed necessary to present each property in its true light, and to enable would-be purchasers to obtain certain reliable data pertaining to each place, preliminary to personal inspection. No attempt has been made to portray the particular attractions which any property may possess other than the facts brought out in direct reply to the questions asked and answered in each instance. Neither has any attempt been made, in fact care has been taken to conceal no conditions which might act as a deterring factor in the sale of a farm if any such existed.

It is to be regretted that enumerators were unable to obtain, in certain instances, selling price, leasing price, or data pertaining to mortgages. The fact remains, however, that each farm listed was either for sale or for lease at the time of enumeration; and the selling or leasing price of a property, which sufficiently interests any person to make this information desirable, can be easily obtained from the farm's owner or his personal representative.

The description of each farm listed is based upon the following list of questions, answers to which were obtained by a corps of enumerators, selected for the work by reason of their practical and successful experience in farming, and their knowledge of the territory to be investigated.

GENERAL AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS IN RHODE ISLAND.

by

Charles W. Brown, Superintendent of R. I. Natural Resources Survey.

GENERAL ECON. GEOLOGY OF RHODE ISLAND.

The population of Rhode Island, according to the census of 1910, showed that on the average, 509 people were living on each of its 1,067 square miles of land area, making it one of the most densely populated of the United States. The population of that thickly settled country, Belgium, is only something over 600 to the square mile. To say then, that Rhode Island offers large opportunities for settlement for creating rural homes appears at first sight rather incongruous. In 1905, the census of the state showed that exactly two-thirds of its land area was devoted to agriculture, and only about one-quarter of that two-thirds (or one-sixth of the entire lands of the state) was under cultivation. What then is the explanation of the fact that with such an high average density of population there are many square miles where the density is one one-hundredth of the average?

The truth is that the population is highly localized in and about the mill-villages, that are strung closely along many of our river valleys, leaving large areas, occupied with but few scattered farmhouses. This then is the reason why Rhode Island offers to any one seeking a rural home splendid opportunities at the present time. The opening of cheap fertile lands in the West formerly depopulated the hilly New England sections. Now that such opportunities do not exist and farming has come to be more of an exact science, there is a surging movement toward these hilly farms, that have been proved to be able to produce certain things of as high quality as other sections of the country. Farm values have appreciated considerably in the last decade, in this state, proving this tendency of the time.

RHODE ISLAND PRODUCTS.

At the present time Rhode Island produces corn, apples and peaches, that have taken first prizes this past year in competition with other New England states. The records of the past forty years of the Department of Agriculture show the possibilities of the state in production along other lines. The situation, climate, and soil are favorable to the development of orchards and small fruits, of potatoes, corn and cereals, and various valuable forest products. The more rocky and hilly land, less suitable for agriculture, can be forested, to be cut later for timber, ties, posts, and wood, with a return of at least four per cent. at compound interest on the investment for the growing period.

MARKETS.

One of the most important factors in the more thorough utilization of the lands of Rhode Island, is the favorable situation with respect to such large markets as Providence (pop. 224,326, 1910), Fall River, Worcester, Boston, New Haven, and New York, that could take readily much more than the entire possible farm and market garden products. The rapid increase during the past few years in urban population and in the cost of foodstuffs, together with the fact that large areas of land are not utilized, or only partially utilized, within relatively few miles of large centers of population like Providence, indicate some of the future possibilities for agriculture and market gardening in Rhode Island.

GENERAL GEOLOGY AND ROCK FORMATIONS.

From the work of the Natural Resources Survey and that of the U. S. Geological Survey, it appears that the state is divided into A crop of celery at the time of blanching. One of Rhode Island farmer's market-gardens. The trucking industry on the light soils about Providence is probably as widely known as that around Norfolk, Va., and the Rhode Island market is right at hand.
gently rolling lowlands and more hilly uplands. The dividing line, which marks a radical difference in both the geography and geology of the state, extends northeasterly from the south shore to Diamond Hill at the northeast corner. In fact the Shore Line Division of the New Haven system runs along this dividing line for a considerable distance, separating the western uplands from the eastern lowlands. To the eastward are nothing but shales, sandstones, and conglomerates of the carboniferous period. Along the western border of the lowlands, however, rocks of varied types occur, such as green schist, and other much-changed rocks, while to the west over the greater part of the uplands occur granites that have been stretched and sheared during the past ages, converting them into granite gneisses. In certain localities heavy dark rocks are found similar in appearance and in possible uses to coarse trap-rock. Throughout the gneissic area there are several quarries located, for this widespread rock has limited use in the production of curbings, paving blocks, rough dimension, and even cut stone, for smaller-sized buildings where great strains are not expected.

GRAVELS, SANDS AND CLAYS.

Throughout the state, along river valleys and skirting the uplands occur level stretches, terraces or benches, and plains of loamy sands and gravel, formed through the action of rivers distributing and depositing placial detritus at the conclusion of the glacial period. In the valleys themselves there are found ridges and irregular hillocks of sand and gravel of similar origin. These deposits are of considerable use in the preparation of cranberry bogs, and in the making of roads in the upland sections. In the uplands there are found limited occurrences of clays, though usually of too coarse a texture, on account of the sand present, to be of much economic importance, although the clay component aids indirectly in the retention of the ground water for vegetal growth. The clays of economic importance are grouped in the lowlands about the Bay.
SOILS.

There is a considerable variety of soils in Rhode Island. This variation in soils is due to the fact that they are derived from the weathering and decay of glacial detritus; gravels, sands, and rock flour. The fine-grained loamy soils are found on the flat hill-tops and in the valley bottoms, where, in the latter location, there is a considerable addition of humus and muck. Fine, sandy, loamy soils occur on the plains and terraces mentioned above. The steeper slopes, subjected to the ceaseless activity of running water, have lost the major portion of the finer loam constituent, and many more boulders and ledges come to the surface. During the long occupancy of the soils since the settlement of the State, however, large areas have been cleared of boulders and put into enclosing stone walls. Even where the boulders are numerous on level areas, the soils are good, as a Rhode Island farmer said, "If I want to get good soils, I go where the boulders are." Apparently the boulders caused a deposit of fine materials. Many times a luxuriant growth continued up to the very edge of the boulder or ledge.

SOIL DEPTH.

The depth of the soils vary widely, owing to the conditions of their origin. About seven or eight inches is the average, however, though both in the valley bottoms and on hill-tops much thicker soils have been noted. Soils vary in composition from fine silty and sandy loams to sands and gravels which occur on glacial hillocks and ridges, or black muck near streams or in marshy areas. The soils are underlaid for varying depths by fine and coarse loam, sand, and immediately above the rock surface, by a gravelly hardpan which has some clay constituent, which holds the water. This hardpan is found at a depth from eighteen inches to ten feet, averaging about three to five feet in the uplands. The variation in types and depths of soil makes varied farming not only possible but almost necessary.
The Rhode Island State College and Experiment Station is actively engaged in its work of cooperation with the farmers of the state in experimenting with various soils and their products, and advising them as to the proper treatment of soils and the appropriate adaptation of different crops to the different soils.

WATER RESOURCES, WELLS, SPRINGS, STREAMS.

Throughout the state there are found many ponds, and marshes that were formerly ponds but have become filled by vegetation. These latter areas may either be drained and their rich deposits converted into fertile land, or the marshes may be changed into cranberry bogs which bring rich rewards, or the areas may be dammed and converted into reservoirs for power or water supply. Existing ponds may be enlarged for this last purpose, and may constitute a considerable portion of the resources of the state.

The presence of these ponds and marshes always indicates activity of a former southward-moving continental ice-sheet, which scraped and modeled the hills and valleys, depositing material in some places that blocked former streams, or scoured out rock basins, giving an opportunity either way for the later accumulation of water. The hilly uplands covered with the mantle of drift provides for the ready drainage, so that only the hollows and valleys are removed from the possibility of rather early plowing.

WELLS.

Wells as a rule run dry but rarely. The prevailing drought of the last three years has subjected the ground water supply to a severe strain, but even then, not a large percentage of the wells have failed. The majority are dug to bed rock,—penetrating but slightly therein,—some twenty to thirty feet in depth, and contained different depths of water, according to location. The water is prevailingly soft and if attention is paid to the proper location, so that no contaminating drainage reaches the well from barns or other out-buildings, the quality is universally excellent. Some wells have been sunk three hundred feet with fairly satisfactory results.

SPRINGS.

The large number of natural reservoirs, together with the hilly nature of the uplands makes springs of common occurrence. Some have been dug out and walled in and supply both house and barn. Others nourish small streams, and stock rarely need watering when turned into pastures. There are a few springs of good quality and large flow that are bottled and sold in the nearest urban center.

STREAMS.

A great many small streams are but wet weather brooks and dry up during the hot weather, but there are a large number, owing to the conditions mentioned in the preceding paragraph, that are persistent and can be made of use to the farmer in a small way for power or other purposes. In one instance a small electric lighting plant for two or three houses was installed. In another an earth dam only fifty feet long and five feet high impounded some twenty-five acres of water, which was stocked with fish. Trout are found in many streams, and bass and pickerel in many of the ponds.

CLIMATE, RAINFALL, FROST.

Among the many factors that make for unsatisfactory or satisfactory conditions for agriculture, one of the most important is the one of climate. Rhode Island is situated along the shore line and extends inward from it some forty miles. Moreover, the sea follows the deep embayment of Narragansett Bay into the very heart of the state to within fifteen miles of its northern border. Ordinarily, differences in climate in twenty miles would be negligible, but when a section borders the sea, certain modifying influences operate. These effects are felt in two ways; first with reference to the nature and amount of precipitation, and second, with regard to the variations in temperature that exist at the shore-line and in the interior.

TEMPERATURE.

The ameliorating influence of the ocean is especially strong in Rhode Island, since the northern edge of the Gulf stream is not far distant. As a rule, the temperatures in Providence go below zero in only occasional winters. Farther south about the Bay the limit is a few degrees higher. But in the interior, away from the warming influence of the salt water, together with the fact that the elevations are greater, the lower winter limit is several degrees beneath the Providence temperatures. In the summer months the contrary fact is noticed and the cooler water minimizes the extremes of summer heat, near the shore-line. On the whole, however, in spite of local differences, the entire state has temperatures much milder both in summer and winter than in the interior of New England.

FROST.

During the seasons of the year when the temperatures are about the critical temperature point of freezing, the ameliorating influence of the salt water is most beneficial. Sweet corn has been picked on the hilltops in November. A severe frost that was of wide extent in the first week of June, 1910, afforded a splendid basis for a comparative study of the manner in which the different sections of the state were affected. A zone bordering the salt water felt its effects but slightly. Altitude, to a certain extent, also moderated its damage, or even prevented any effects from this frost. But the slopes and especially the lower places throughout the uplands felt its effects keenly. This frost was limited, then, to the lower parts of the uplands away from the water, which restricted the loss to a considerably less area than in other sections of New England.
RAINFALL, NATURE, AMOUNT.

The changes of temperature at critical times, mentioned in the preceding paragraph operate, too, in the winter months of the year from November to March, by causing the precipitation to occur as rain, sleet, or snow. Rain may be falling along the southern part of the Bay, sleet about Providence, and snow seven miles west in the uplands. The interior of the state will have a larger number of clear days with a smaller rainfall, though with a larger snowfall.

The amount of the precipitation is greater near the area under the influence of the ocean, than in the higher interior. Undoubtedly, more of the smaller amount is preserved to the ground water supply from the fact that a larger percentage falls as snow and melts slowly, rather than falling as rain and rapidly running in the streams. Though varying conditions govern the observations made during the past dry year, Kingston shows 45"; Hope Valley 40"; Greene 36"; and Wallum Lake 30" of rainfall annually.
